ABSTRACT

The readability of financial statements is considered important and informative in assessing audit engagement risk. Auditors view less readable financial statements as a signal of higher client business risk and litigation risk. This study aims to examine the effect of readability of financial statements on audit fee, audit report lag, and going concern opinion. This study uses a sample of 722 companies listed on the Indonesia Stock Exchange for period 2014-2018. The results of this study indicate that readability of financial statements significantly influences audit fee, audit report lag, and going concern opinion. These results are being interpreted that auditors assess the poor readability of financial statements as higher client business risk and potentially alleviate the litigation risk. These conditions induce the auditor to charge a risk premium by charging higher audit fees, taking longer the audit process, or being more likely to issue a going concern opinion.
