Reviewer #2: The authors consider a very important and relevant question as poverty still remains endemic in many developing countries. Thus, any attempt to provide evidence that can guide policy should be encouraged. The authors tried to motivate their study by situating it in the context of existing studies and discussed how they intend to add to the knowledge in the context of their analysis. Also, empirical methods discussed and utilised are appropriate and relevant to the study.

However, my main reservation with the paper is the shortness of the longitudinal data employed in the study. It is difficult, if not impossible, to make any meaningful statement about chronic poverty with just two waves. Put differently, observing individuals in poverty twice (between 2008 and 2010) is not enough to conclude that they are chronically poor. Ideally, they need to be observed over a number of years before such conclusion can be made. Of course I am aware that it is difficult to get long panel data for poverty analysis in developing countries, Indonesia inclusive. So I will not be asking the authors to do the impossible. Rather, I will suggest that the authors should augment their data with additional waves of the National Socio-Economic Survey of Indonesia. Both the 2012 and 2014 waves of the National Socio-Economic Survey of Indonesia should be readily available for this purpose.

Dear Dr purwono,

I am pleased to inform you that your paper has now been accepted for publication. My own comments as well as any reviewer comments are appended to the end of this letter.

Your accepted manuscript will now be transferred to our production team. They will create the proofs which you will be asked to check. If you have submitted abstract and keywords to your article during the submission process, do check and ensure that they are available in the proofs. If missing, do alert the production team. You can read more about this here:
https://service.elsevier.com/app/answers/detail/a_id/6007/p/10592/supporthub/publishing/related

Meanwhile, you will be asked to complete a number of online forms required for publication. If we need additional information from you during the production process, we will contact you directly.

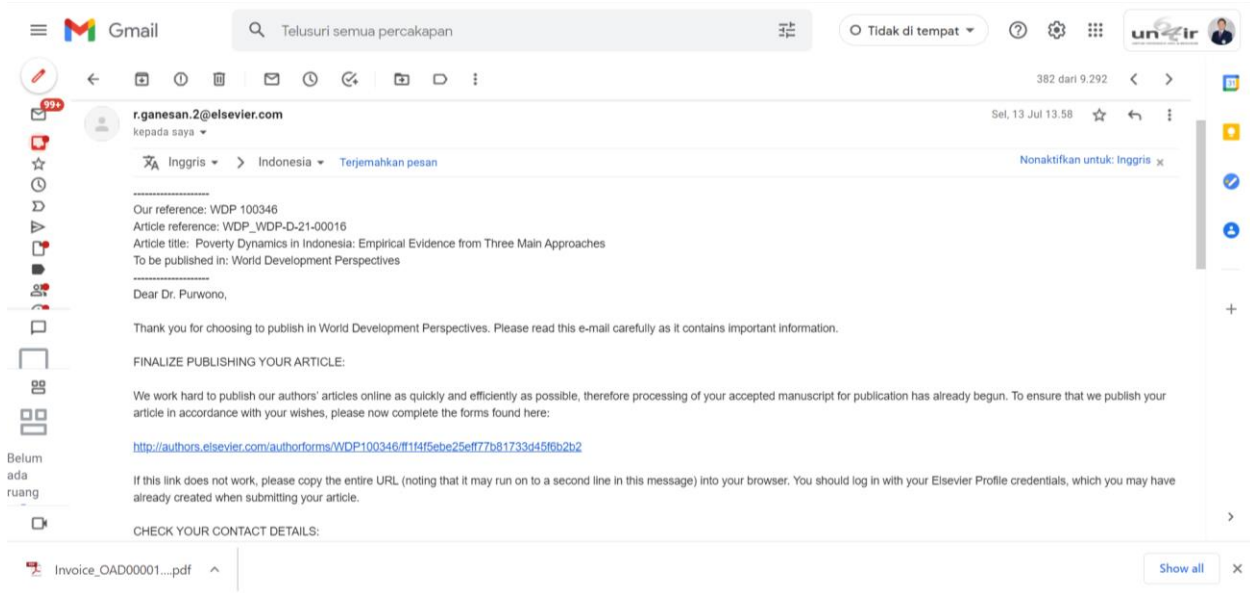

Thank you for submitting your work to World Development Perspectives. We hope you consider us again for future submissions.

Kind regards,
Pamela Jagger
