Knowing she got pregnant, she explores her options. At first, the first solution and win-win to her and society option is abortion, as her bestfriend Leah (Olivia Thirlby) suggested the moment Juno told her about being pregnant. Some of her friends at school already did abortion before. She, then, signed her name up for an abortion in one of women clinic, yet she couldn't do it. The second option came up, she keeps the baby, keep being pregnant, keep going to school as usual, and in approximately thirty weeks, she deliver the baby and give it to adoption.

Her everyday-life experience started the moment she decide to keep the baby. Juno is starting to get the society's a lot of attention. People stares at her belly when talking to her, people whisper about her, people give her nickname. People, here, are not only her friends at school, but the teachers and school staff, too, plus, the society at large.

After a pregnant trimester passed, she finally deliver the baby and give it to the determined adoptive parent, Vannessa Loring (Jennifer Garner).
