

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

After accomplishing the analysis of the story, the writer may conclude that the pressure from the family result in the suffering of Anne Elliot. The condition of the society outside the family really affects her. The meaningful environment outside the family eventually makes her realize about the reality of the class difference in the society, as is seen from her experience in Uppercross.

The family's pressure, that demands her to associate only with her equals, caused Anne's suffering during her youth. The fact that she is separated from the man she loves causes her pain. The condition of the family, their thoughts and their attitudes makes her feel unworthy, as can be read from the condition of her family at her house.

Conversely, the society outside the family influences her and improves her courage to face her family. The condition outside the family makes her realize that actually the high class may also associate with the other class even though it is the lower class. Moreover they also may marry others disregarding any social class or wealth they have. As long as they love each other and they believe that they can reach the happiness it is not forbidden for them to be married.

Weber stated that the social stratification is the omnipresent fact in human society. It caused the class system in the society. Anne Elliot can be regarded as a victim of the class difference. She must suffer in her youth, since her family believes on the class difference. Eventually, Anne can reach her happiness by marrying the man she loves, even though he comes from a different class. Accordingly, Wentworth, the man she loves, has also realizes that actually he still loves her. The fact that Anne is a woman who has such good personality and that she is only being persuaded by her family in breaking their engagement make him return to her.

BIBLIOGRAPHY