Manuscript Title: Worker Transition Across Formal And Informal Sectors: A Panel Data Analysis In Indonesia

Abstract: This paper examines the transition of workers between formal and informal jobs based on socio-demographic characteristics and employment characteristics. The study also identifies factors that drive workers' transitions between informal and formal activities and factors that increase the likelihood of workers remaining in formal employment. The multinomial logistic regression model is incorporated to analyze labor transitions based on panel data from Indonesia's National Labor Force Survey (Sakernas) of 2017-2018, consisting of 69,676 observational units. The findings show that most of workers (56.34%) were in informal activities and 30.58% were in formal jobs. Workers who transit from informal to formal jobs were only 6.84% while those who transit from formal to informal occupations were 6.24% of total workers. During this time informal workers were reluctant to move to the formal sector. Younger workers, unmarried, male, living in urban areas, and more educated workers are more likely to relocate from the informal to the formal sector. Moreover, we find that work experience and participation in certified training can help shift workers to the formal sector, especially within the manufacturing industry.
