Title of your paper: CONTRACEPTIVE USE AMONG UNMARRIED WOMEN
NINDONESIA: A NATIONAL SURVEY

Keywords: unmarried women, contraceptive use, maternal health, public health, Indonesia.

Abstract: The norm in Indonesia places a pregnant, unmarried woman as a disgrace, and the situation can influence the decision to use contraceptives. This research aimed to analyze contraceptive use among unmarried women in Indonesia. We employed the 2017 Indonesian Demographic Health Survey data. The analysis unit in this study was unmarried women of childbearing age (15-49), and we analyzed 5,444 respondents. The study used contraceptive use as a dependent variable and analyzed seven independent variables: residence, age, marital, education, employment, parity, and wealth. The study used a multivariable binary logistic regression for the final stage. We show that unmarried women living in urban areas are 1.591 (95% CI 1.183-2.141) times more likely than unmarried women living in rural areas to use contraceptives. Unmarried women in the 15-19 were more likely to use contraceptives than those in the 35-39 and 40-44. All education level categories are more likely to use contraceptives than no education. Unmarried women with more children are more likely to use contraceptives than unmarried women who have one child or do not have a child. Wealth status affects contraceptive use among unmarried women in Indonesia. The study concluded five variables that influence contraceptive use among unmarried women in Indonesia, namely the type of place, age, education, parity, and wealth. The government needs to be more open to this reality and develop policies to anticipate this situation. Appropriate interventions could encourage comprehensive sex education, community engagement, youth-friendly reproductive health services, and gender equality.
