

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

After the writer analyses the story of the novel, he finds out that there are two kinds of dream of Jude; the dream of learning and love. Both of them influence Jude's life until he dies. The dream of learning emerges when his school master Mr. Phillotson leaves his village and gives Jude the message to meet him when Jude is in Christminster. However, his schoolmaster's message to meet him in Christminster has given an important contribution to Jude's dream for learning; after he sees the city as the halo in the dark on the northeastward from the highest place of the village called Ridgetrack. Jude is more interested in the city after he gets the explanation that Christminster is the city of education, religion and beautiful music.

His dream of love emerges when he meets his cousin, Sue, in Christminster. Her beauty and cleverness are the conditions that make him fall in love with her. To manifest this dream he willingly releases his theological school and burns all his theological and ethic books. Also he lives with her without being married.

The conditions that make him fail to manifest his dream in learning are because he is a stone worker and lives in poverty. In this case, the master of the university advises him not to enter the university because he will get a success in stone-trade. In other words, Jude is rejected by the academic society for his poverty and they do not give him opportunity to get progress.

The condition that makes he fails to manifest his dream of love is because Sue leaves him after the death of their children by hanging themselves. Sue thinks that she has done a big sin by living unmarried with Jude. Besides, the society rejects them for their unmarried life so that they have to move from one city to another in which they are not recognized.

The failure in reaching his dream in learning gives him a bad effect. He goes to the bar to drink to appease his disappointment. He becomes melancholy and loses his enthusiasm of life. He criticizes the people in authority who do not give him the opportunity to study in the university.

The failure in reaching his dream of love gives him the bad effect. He is trapped in alcohol and becomes melancholy. He does not care when he has to marry Arabella again. His mind usually concentrates to Sue that makes his health worse. As a result, he dies in loneliness in Christminster the city that is his early dream.
