

SYNOPSIS

William Crimsworth was an English aristocratic man who rejected his aristocratic inheritance and went to Brussels to find his fortune. Different from her brother who had become a successful tradesman, William preferred to be an English tutor in Brussels.

His profession as The Professor possible him to meet a lot of girls, most were his pupils. Toward them he usually gave his comment and his judgement. Nobody gave him a great impression except Frances Henri, a young woman who determined to make her way in the world.

Frances was different from all the women that Crimsworth met. She was an orphan child who lived with her aunt. Her aunt was too poor to send her to school, so she was never at school. However she realized that she should propose herself with an education. Hence she tried to make money by herself.

She was not only independent but she also possessed a perseverance and an intellectual strength. She had a strong will to study and to learn, eventhough she had to work hard to support it, by teaching and doing lace mending.

However her job as a lace mender was quite hard for her, because her pupils despised her because she was just a lace mending teacher. She was not respect by her pupils, however by Crimsworth guidance she could make herself obeyed.

Meanwhile Frances' personality made Crimsworth fell in love with her. But the jealousy of Mdlle.Zoraide Reuter separated them. After the long searching, finally he could find her. He proposed her for the marriage and this was gladly accepted by Frances. Meanwhile she had found another job as a teacher in English first school in Belgium.

However before the marriage, Frances made a commitment that she wanted to continue her career she had while she was single. Her decision was supported by her husband. Hence both had the same profession as teachers. As a teacher, she was dedicated to her profession, she tried to establish a school for girls which later on became the most popular school in Brussels.

A success in her career was also followed with her success in family life. As a wife she was full of respect toward her husband and as a mother she had a good relationship with her only son, Victor.

Eventhough only half of her blood was England, Frances had a deep love in her mother's native country. Having reach all her dream, to be a respectful teacher, finally Crimsworth and her came back to England, and lived in Crimsworth native land, _____shire.
